

UTNE READER

25 Visionaries Who Are Changing Your World

by Utne Reader staff and contributors - November-December 2010

Facebook Twitter Digg Delicious

 Image Gallery

Nelson Mandela didn't always look like a visionary. In fact, for 27 years, he simply looked like a prisoner, locked up in South African jail cells for his anti-apartheid activism. But what seemed like a long exercise in futility is now the stuff of legend: After his release in 1990 he became his country's president, and today he's celebrated not as an outlaw but as an icon of commitment and compassion.

ARTICLE TOOLS

-  Image Gallery
-  Print
-  E-mail
-  Comments
-  RSS

 BOOKMARK

RELATED CONTENT

Tim Wise: The Confrontationalist

The promise of a post-racial society is premature, Wise argues in his book Colorblind. This activism...

Ted Howard: Workers' Advocate

Instead of reheating failed job-creation strategies like tax breaks for corporations, Utne Reader v...

Natalia Allen: Conscientious Fashionista

More than 8,000 chemicals were used to make the clothes in your closet. Approximately 1,800 gallons...

Kieran Egan: Teacher of the Fortunately, visionary thinkers aren't always imprisoned, but they are often ridiculed, marginalized, or just plain dismissed for proposing big ideas that may sound outlandish to others. Get people to invest in local food systems? Good luck with that. Identify and dismantle the roots of violence? Sure you will. Create a global grassroots movement to halt climate change? Very funny.

Yet these are just a few of the lofty, laudable, and reachable goals of the 25 forward thinkers featured on the following pages. Instead of pushing these women and men to the edges, as our politics and media often do, we aim to celebrate their courage and encourage both admiration and emulation.

Elizabeth Scharpf: Essential Entrepreneur

Utne Reader Visionary

by Joe Hart, Utne Reader - November-December 2010

 Facebook  Twitter  Digg  Delicious

A simple lack of menstrual pads keeps many women and girls in developing nations home from work and school. Scharpf's Sustainable Health Enterprises supports entrepreneurs in Rwanda and other countries in devising sustainable pads.

RELATED CONTENT

JAY WALLJASPER NAMED UTNE READER EDITOR

15-year Utne veteran assumes top editorial post...

The Utne Family and the Utne Family

Two decades of life with the odd little newsletter that grew up...

Old-School Urban Planning

Around the turn of the last century, city planning was motivated by concern for

Extras:

“Eighteen percent of girls in Rwanda miss, on average, 35 days of school every year due to their periods and ineffective pads and the embarrassment and ridicule that ensues,” according to Fast Company's profile of Elizabeth Scharpf. The “blood cost” of young African women was Scharpf's reason for founding the she28 campaign, which aims to supply 1 million women with pads made from banana leaves. Keep up to date with Scharpf's humanitarian enterprises on the SHE blog, Twitter, or Facebook.

ARTICLE TOOLS

Print

E-mail

Comments

RSS

 BOOKMARK 